BIO 2019

Dodd Galbreath is the founding director and an associate professor of sustainability at Lipscomb University. In 2007, he launched the Southeast's first and still only comprehensive academic sustainability program. Housed in the College of Leadership and Public Service, the Institute offers one undergraduate major, two graduate degrees, and 9 certificates in sustainability. Galbreath has worked for the past for 36 years in various private sector roles and in federal, state and local government. He worked under two former governors of two different political parties and has been appointed to boards and committees by three Nashville mayors. Galbreath has traveled throughout the United States, China and six European countries studying the sustainability of natural resource, urban and energy practices. He has been quoted in The New York Times, The Wall Street Journal, USA Today and in many state and regional media outlets. He also provides consulting services to education, business, government and non-profit clients.
